CMV adds two more ships

CRUISE & Maritime Voyages (CMV) has announced the purchase of outgoing P&O ships Pacific Dawn and Pacific Aria.

Only this week, P&O revealed it would be bidding farewell to Aria and Dawn from its fleet in 2021 as part of a ship replacement strategy (CW 26 Nov), with CMV today confirming it would take the vessels, boosting its capacity by 30% to 9,000 berths.

CMV has already flagged plans to officially rename the duo when it takes delivery of the ships in mid-2021, following a planned dry docking in Singapore where some minor upgrades to amenities and the ships' livery will be completed.

The new ship names will be initially unveiled in late Dec, and be inspired by CMV's explorer theme which aims to reflect "a more traditional cruise experience that can access harder-to-reach ports".

"The introduction of two more ships to the global ocean fleet is the next exciting chapter of our strategic growth objectives," said CMV's CEO Christian Verhounig.

"This will enable us to service increasing market demand for our traditional brand of cruising, generated by our expanding international network of in-house sales offices and developing source markets," he added.

Aria will be deployed to the German market under the TransOcean Kreuzfahrten brand, while Dawn will service the UK region from late May.

CMV has now acquired five cruise ships in five years and are on course to carry 200,000 passengers by 2021.

The inaugural 2021 programs will go on sale during Q1, 2020, with launch incentives planned to encourage early bookings.

The science of cruising

HURTIGRUTEN Cruises will continue to build on its sustainability program by welcoming a raft of scientists on board its ships during the 2019 and 2020 seasons to help support marine conservation projects.

Speaking with CW, the company's Managing Director APAC Damian Perry said the line was well positioned to help make a valuable contribution to data collection initiatives.

"We're very heavily engaged in the science and we are doing so much research and so much work because we are going to remote areas which aren't easy to access and we are using our facilities and our ships to continue science programs and actually share that data and information with universities around the world," Perry said.

Scientists from environmental organisation Oceanities will be welcomed aboard two MS Fram trips to the Falkland Islands, South Georgia and Antarctica from 30 Dec, where they will use the ship to monitor and analyse penguin and bird populations in the warming Antarctic Peninsula.

Further projects include a collaboration with scientist Allison Cusick from the SCRIPPS Institution of Oceanography, who will be on board Roald Amundsen in Antarctica to collect phytoplankton through the Citizen Science project FjordPhyto, to determine the impact of increasing melt-water on phytoplankton populations.

MSC improves access

MSC Cruises has flagged plans to roll out its accessible shore excursions program to eight more ports over the next 12 months.

To cater for less mobile guests, land tours will be completely step-free and accessible to wheelchairs wherever possible, as well only travelling over short distances for abbreviated lengths of time.

"We have always been sensitive to the needs of our guests, and constantly strive to offer the best possible service, meeting international accessibility standards," said MSC Cruises Head of Shore Excursions Jean-Pierre Joubert.

Destinations on offer in MSC's Accessible Tours Program include San Juan, Puerto Rico, Marseilles, France, the Caribbean and the Mediterranean.

IN A stunning act of innovation last month, a farmer in Tennessee turned his home-grown 400kg pumpkin into a boat...because what else would you do with a giant pumpkin?

Farmer Justin Ownby, who has been trying to grow a 1,000lb (450kg) pumpkin for the past four years, hollowed out the pumpkin to harvest the seeds, and then took the makeshift boat out for a spin in his pond, with his kids and wife joining in on the fun.

Apparently Ownby wasn't the first to come up with the idea though, with pumpkin boat races taking place in Morton, Illinois in Nov each year - who would've thought?

Do you see what icy?

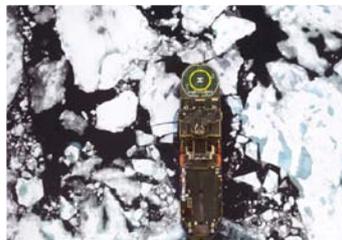

SILVERSEA Cruises has released its top 10 images from a recent trip across the Northwest Passage on Silver Explorer, with the cruise line capturing a host of breathtaking images.

Sailing from Nome, Alaska to Tromsø, Norway, the expedition traversed some of the Arctic's most remote destinations, allowing its passengers to take in the icy waters, isolated townships and impressive wildlife.

Venice protests

THOUSANDS of activists have staged a protest in Venice to voice concerns that cruise ship arrivals are contributing to frequent flooding in the city.

Media reports suggest demonstrators are calling out the frequent docking of cruise ships in Venetian lagoons as a significant cause of erosion of the city's foundations - in turn exacerbating flooding.

The protest march also saw the chanting of "Venice resist", calling for Mayor Luigi Brugnaro to resign over a number of concerns, namely corruption and an over-budget infrastructure project.

Euro river trends

THE European river cruise market is undergoing a shipbuilding boom, according to the CEO of European nautical management firm Rivertech Johan Rijfers.

Purchasing trends noted by Rijfers include lines asking for more ships with balcony rooms and second restaurants.
